social euthanasia within war economy Social Cleansing

The taxpayer does not yet know what to expect. The appearance of bona fides by the American government with the various reports on health care functions as a cover for predatory and profit-driven criminal practices. Health care based on purely cost-benefit analysis in a modern society where only consumption and profit count, the risk of economic euthanasia is enormous. The strong aging of the population and an economic recession in combination with crisis could further strengthen this trend. The United States is moving to a war economy. This means that the government will further maximize the costs for defense and scale down care for the elderly and disabled, such as Obama Care 2009 Affordable Care Act, hereby also criminalizing and phasing out certain groups of our society such as the homeless and addicts who do not seem to be economically useful . As with Grant Pass where homeless people can be arrested and fined if they sleep outside while there are no safe alternatives . The most important touchstone is to set aside the international treaties on human rights. So sailing purely on economic compass. In the climate of stricter and more inflexible rules in our society, the simple citizen is in danger of suffocating. Many will feel that their well-being is being neglected. And ultimately see euthanasia as the only solution for their growing suffering. The cost-saving measures in elderly care in the United States, combined with the fact that social life is becoming more expensive, is taking America in the direction where the elderly, the sick, the addicted and the weak are lining up to be killed because they feel that they are a burden to their environment.
